In spite of Lawyer Delany's protest Chairman Terry decided that the case must go on, but stated that all the time necessary to present Schillinger's side of the case would be given. No undue advantage would be taken of the defendant.

Lawyer Thornton said he had enough evidence of frauds to submit to-day to throw out three election districts, and to unseat Schillinger.

Lawyer Phillips, representing the contestant in the case of Conkling against McGuire, in Richmond County, asked the Committee to sit in Staten Island either to-morrow or next day to take testimony.

Gen. Wingate, who represented McGuire asked for more time, and it was decided to hold the hearing there next.

window, and went downstairs to investigate. He discovered that the escaping gas came from within the saloon. De Vann looked through the window and saw the body of a man lying across the bar. He tried the door, but could not open it. A policeman was notified, who went to Fuss's house, a block away, to get the keys of the saloon. Mrs. Fuss had a duplicate key, and went down with the officer to open the saloon. When the door was tried they found it was locked from the inside.

The door was forced open, and lying across the bar was the dead body of Fuss. In his right hand was clasped a chandeller bracket, which had been broken from the celling. The barroom was filled with escaping gas.

Fuss had closed up for the night, and evidently reached to put out the gas. It is supposed that he had been drinking and losing his balance fell and pulled the bracket from the celling.

Being under the influence of liquor he could not help himself and was suffocated.
